At 15, Bridget found herself pregnant, frightened and overwhelmed. Then the school nurse introduced her to ECHO (Education Creates Hope and Opportunity), our program for teen moms that helps them continue their education. With our assistance, Bridget discovered her true self: a young mother determined to fight for herself and her new family by pursuing the education vital to their future. Turn to page two to see just how far she’s come.
ECHO has helped Bridget Andersen reach her potential.

When Bridget discovered she was pregnant, she confided in the school nurse, who put her in touch with the case manager from ECHO – Education Creates Hope and Opportunity – a program begun by Catholic Charities to help keep teen moms in school.

It was clear with Bridget early on. She was going to raise her baby and complete her high-school education. So she met with the principal, her parents and others who would play a role in discussing her future. With their assistance, Bridget made a plan to finish high school and eventually go on to college.

Meanwhile, Bridget found that being pregnant as a freshman was a great social challenge. Her friends were well meaning, but failed to understand the difficulty of her circumstances.

“I remember my friends thought being pregnant was really cool, but it wasn’t,” says Bridget. “I was feeling the weight of being a mom at 15 and it was really scary.”

But Bridget found the support she needed from her parents, the administrators at school, her boyfriend Damon, and her ECHO case manager. With their help, she found the confidence and resolve to see it through.

“Bridget was an ideal client,” says Liz Flaherty, one of her former ECHO caseworkers. “She was always focused on her goals, always fighting for her family and her future.”

Her son, Damon Jr., was born the following August and, soon after, Bridget began her sophomore year. However, the following March, her son became seriously ill and required constant attention so Bridget dropped out of school to care him.

She never waivered from her goal of getting her HSE (formerly GED).

ECHO stepped in and found a program with flexible hours so she could continue her studies. Bridget persevered through her son’s illness and remarkably graduated at 18 with her peers.

She didn’t stop there. Today Bridget is working to complete her associate’s degree in nursing at Ivy Tech and plans eventually to attend IPFW to get her bachelor’s degree.

“I’m not sure where I’ll end up in my career, but I really feel a need to be there for other moms who are struggling so maybe working in the NICU or at a doctor’s office is in my future.”

Bridget’s father, Damon Sr., visited Bridget and son nearly every day. Over time, they formed the bonds of family and eventually had another child, Elijah, who is now four years old. Bridget and Damon Sr. are both continuing their education to build a more secure future for their family.

What advice does Bridget have for other young moms in her position?

“Don’t drop out of school,” she says. “A lot of girls are scared and don’t know what to do, but don’t be afraid to ask for help. And course I would tell other girls to go to ECHO. They helped me a lot.”

“I really feel a need to be there for other moms who are struggling so maybe working in the NICU or at a doctor’s office is in my future.”

GLORIA WHITCRAFT - CEO
Why ECHO is so important in the fight against poverty.

According to the national average, only about 40% of teen parents graduate from high school. Compare that figure with the 90+% graduation rate for ECHO participants. This basic level of achievement has a profound effect on earning potential, which in turn helps keep many above the poverty level.

According to 2015 Bureau of Labor statistics, the average unemployment rate nationally for the non-high-school graduate is 8.0%, compared with 5.4% for a high-school graduate. Similarly, the average weekly income for someone without a high-school diploma is $493, $678 for the high-school graduate and $1,137 a week for the person with a bachelor’s degree.

“One of the best things we can do to address poverty is to prevent it,” says Gloria Whitcraft, CEO of Catholic Charities. “ECHO is the most effective program we have for reducing the risk of single mothers falling into poverty.”

Our goal with ECHO is to provide support to young parents so they can stay in school and create a better future for themselves and their children. Many teen moms feel their dreams of college and a career vanish when they become pregnant.

ECHO can help them keep those dreams alive.

Through Catholic Charities, young women and men receive school and home-based management services, which include monitoring school attendance and grades. ECHO case managers help the students set goals, and provide them with the support and resources necessary to achieve them. ECHO staff also work closely with parents, administrators, teachers, and guidance counselors to keep these teens in school so they can graduate.

ECHO case managers generally start with finishing their HSE (formerly GED) or high-school diploma. They also help them find a job, and even obtain scholarships and grants for college. Our staff works in cooperation with officials in Fort Wayne Community and East Allen County school districts, and in South Bend with the South Bend Community Schools Corporation.
